

misery upon them. Further, Gruoch had a son Lulach who she felt had a strong claim to the throne. Through marriage to MacBeth she felt her son might eventually become King. After MacBeth's death in 1057, Lulach was King for a few months but was defeated and killed by Malcolm Canmore who then became Malcolm III.

Duncan was buried on the Isle of Iona as indicated by this conversation between Ross and McDuff from Shakespeare's MacBeth:

R: Then 'tis most likely the sovereignty will fall upon MacBeth.

M: He is already named, and goes to Scone to be invested.

R: Where is Duncan's Body?

M: Carried to Icolmkill [Iona], the sacred storehouse of his predecessors and guardian of their bones.

C. MALCOLM III (CANMORE), QUEEN MARGARET & THEIR SONS. During this reign deep changes took place in Scotland's political, social and especially religious life. Malcolm adored his wife Margaret who had been raised in the English court and was deeply religious almost to the point of fanaticism. Largely thru her influence, English practices began to be introduced into Scottish society, particularly in the Lowlands. Until this time the Celtic Catholic and Roman Catholic churches had been largely autonomous from each other. The Celtic (centered at Iona) was influential in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Norway and parts of France, while Rome predominated in the rest of Europe and England. Margaret did not like some of the Celtic practices and it became her major aim to bring the Scottish Church more in conformity with the Roman.

It was during Malcolm III's reign that the burial-place for Scotland's Kings was changed from Iona to Dunfermline. Malcolm also introduced the English titles of Duke, Earl and Baron into Scotland. He reigned from 1057 to 1093 and in turned was killed in battle.

A struggle for the crown took place between Malcolm's brother Donal-Bane, and Malcolm's son, Duncan II. Duncan drove out his uncle, but was killed the year after and Donal-Bane took over until the English intervene in 1098 and put Malcolm's elder son, and rightful heir Edgar, on the throne. Edgar ruled 1098-1106 and was succeeded by his younger brother Alexander I whose reign lasted until 1124. He was followed by Malcolm Canmore's youngest son David I who died in 1153.

During the 60 years of rule by Malcolm III's sons the move toward things English and Roman was gradual, but pronounced. Commerce was nearly all restricted to trade with England. The English concept of burgh or borough was adopted. Edgar abandoned the palace at Dunfermline and held Court at Edinburgh in the English fashion. Alexander promoted the building of churches and monasteries and made them generous grants of lands and revenues. David divided the Kingdom into parishes with each manor becoming a parish. He founded 4 bishoprics and an organized system to collect Church revenues. Abbey's were founded at Holyrood, Melrose, Dryburgh, Jedburgh, Kelso and Stirling. The English tongue came to be spoken in a large part of the Lowlands and gradually, most of Scotland came under the feudal law. Only in the Highlands were these changes strongly resisted.

During this time many reforms were instituted: The penalty of