

CHAPTER VIII

MAJOR GENERAL LACHLAN MACQUARIE (1761-1824)

A. Ancestry and Youth. Like many other men who have risen to fame and high position, Major General Macquarie was humbly born. His father belonged to the MacQuarries of Ormaig, the poorer of the two branches of the Clan. There is a tradition that he was a carpenter. The General's mother, Margaret, was a sister of Chief Murdock MacLaine of Lochbuie. Her mother, in turn, was a half-sister of Lachlan MacQuarrie XVth, Chief of Ulva, the father of Lachlan XVIth. The marriage of related persons was a common thing in the Isles. For 200 years MacQuarries, Macleans and MacLaines often married among themselves.

Margaret MacLaine MacQuarrie became a widow with several children. By their own hard work, and with help from Murdock MacLaine, she and her children eked out a meager living on a hardscrabble at Oskamull (near Ulva) which she rented from the Duke of Argyll. Two sons died early in life. Betty, a daughter married a neighbor. Three sons remained: Donald who lived to the age of 51, Charles who stayed on the farm several years and then became an army officer, and Lachlan who spent his whole life in the army ultimately becoming Governor of New South Wales. His life, times and adventures have been set forth fully in an excellent biography by Malcolm Ellis[18].

Lachlan Macquarie was born Jan 31, 1761, on Ulva. Early in life he came under the tutelage of his uncle Murdock, "a great Highland laird whose grounds for game were the most extensive in Mull", but who more importantly, aided him "in getting through the world with credit and honor". Tradition says Lachbuie sent his nephew to the Royal High School in Edinburgh, but this can't be verified as no records predate 1800. Anyway, he didn't attend school very long anywhere; he entered the army at an early age. His close relationship with his uncle was a decided advantage to him; probably better than anything his father could have done.

B. Career Up to Becoming Governor. Eager for action, Lachlan joined the 84th Regiment, commanded by was his cousin, Colonel Allan MacLean of Torloisk. Headed for the American Revolution, this Regiment wore uniforms "diversified with raccoon-skin sporrans, and [was] led by officers armed with claymore and dirk".

Young Lachlan was 15 years old when he landed in Halifax, Nova Scotia in Oct 1776. It was not until 5 months later that he received a commission as Ensign, the standard-bearer of the British army of that day. He served throughout Nova Scotia, but in 1781 was transferred to the 71st Highland and served in New York, Charlestown and Jamaica. Had he not gone to Jamaica, he likely would have surrendered with Cornwallis at Yorktown. Having experienced no actual combat, he came home a Lieutenant on half pay. Since 1781-83 were famine years, he found his family working harder than ever on the Oskamull farm. One undocumented story has him attending Edinburgh University; the distance there makes this unlikely. Probably he spent 3 years working on the farm while keeping contact with friends and acquaintances by letter.

At age 26 he joined the 77th Regiment in India in 1787. At this time he began to keep a daily record of his doings and reflections on a multitude of subjects and this has been very valuable in learning about his life and character. About a year after arriving in India, he was promoted to Captain. He was present at the siege of Cananore in 1790 with the victory over Prince Ali Rajah, his consort Bibbe and 5000 troops. In 1790 he took part in the victory at the Battle of Seringapatam.

In 1792, while still in India, he met Miss Jane Jarvis, a young lady "of a most amiable disposition and temper, with a good understanding and a mind well-cultivated and instructed by the best of finished education". They were married a year later, but to his great sorrow she died in Jan 1797.

In 1795 Macquarie was in the field in Cochin China and in 1796 he was in Ceylon and promoted to Brevet-major. In 1799 it was the 2nd siege of Seringapatam and in 1800 he took part in the siege of Alexandria, Egypt. 1800 saw him transferred to the 86th Regiment and made Brevet Lieutenant-colonel.

He returned to England and during 1803-4, Macquarie was Assistant Adjutant General in London under the command of Lord Harrington, who was descended from Charles II and his mistress Barbara Villiers. Macquarie felt his position was a "very honorable one, but also very troublesome and laborious". In many respects it was little more than a social job; attending fancy dress balls, horse-back riding in the park and going to the theater with various parties. Although he felt it was a useless (although enjoyable) life, it did give him a courtly polish which partly made up for his lack of formal education. It also gave him wider acquaintance and brought him to the attention of many people of influence and authority.

Macquarie returned home to Mull in 1804 to be at the bedside of his guardian uncle, Murdock MacLaine, who was sinking fast but "hanging on in true Scotch tenacity". He also took steps to acquire the estate at Gruline on which he hoped to spend his retirement years when his military service was over.

Also on this visit home he met and became engaged to Miss Elizabeth Campbell, daughter of Campbell of Airds[14]. She was a capable young woman whose love and wise judgement proved to be a bulwark of strength to him all the rest of his life. He vowed he would never take a wife to India again, so marriage was postponed until he finished another term of service there in 1807.

A matter of fact recital of these event, dates, etc. may be monotonous and boring, but it shows steady development, advancement in his profession and progress toward being a true Scottish laird. He became known as a man of abnormal and inexhaustible energy and of unlimited ambition and once before the death of the old Chief of Ulva said, "Our ancient Clan and name of late years are reduced to great poverty indeed: and I assure you it would afford me the most heartfelt pleasure and gratification to raise a few of the most deserving of them from obscurity"[18].

His purpose and concern for Clan honor were no doubt back of his successful effort to secure military commissions for so many of his young kinsmen. But his desire to bring honor to the MacQuarrie name was fulfilled in himself by his achievement of a high place in history and in the grateful memory of millions.

C.MACQUARIE'S PREDECESSORS IN NEW SOUTH WALES(NSW). Founded in 1788, NSW had grown in population, but its great handicap was that it was treated primarily as a penal colony, for thousands of prisoners had been transported there from the mother country. This reputation held back the colony's development.

Several Governors[all naval men], appointed by the crown, had followed one another in rapid succession. None accomplished much for the colony's good. Beset by one weaknesses or another, ambitious for themselves, many engaged in the rum business or farming on the side or enacted laws that were favorable to their own interests. Competent as sea-captains, they knew little of getting along with people or about administration of government.

The trade in rum was especially voluminous and the source of trouble for years. The officers of the regiment present to guard the prisoners were so notoriously involved that the group became known as the "Rum Corps". The influence of the rum traffic was a social cancer and curse; it spread far and deep into the entire life of the colony.

Ellis says, "Influential colonist had established a wide trade in rum within ten years after the establishment of the colony. The business was in the hands of persons who, although...officers, were not alway "gentlemen". By virtue of their official positions they had water-tight control over...goods... permitted to be imported..." Rum was accepted in payment of debt and the added incentive was it could be disposed of at a high profit. Demand for liquor was so great that fantastic profits, sometimes as high as 800%, could be made.

Officers of the Rum Corps bought rum from visiting ships and used it to buy livestock, farms, etc. from settlers or released prisoners, who were victim of their appetite for drink. Conditions and work were very hard in the colony, often with meager return. Drowning trouble in drink was widespread and many became hopeless alcoholics.

In the 14 years before Macquarie, there had been 3 governors. Captain John Hunter(1795-1800), an excellent sailor, was honest and well-meaning, but not strong enough to cope with the Rum Corps. He also had trouble with former convicts, some of whom refused to obey his orders. Many became robbers and brigands who preyed on settlers in the back country. In fairness, we should say that Hunter did not have full cooperation from the government in London. It repeatedly ignored his recommendations and appeals for help. Further the courts in the colony were often manned or dominated by officers of the Rum Corps. Thus, in spite of honest intentions, Hunter did little that was remedial or constructive.

Phillip King(1800-1806) was a younger man of 52, who was more vigorous and masterful. King did what he could to control the officers and had some success, but in the long run he could not cope with the rum traffic. He left after lining his own nest with land grants.[18].

The next Governor sent to NSW was William Bligh(1806-1810), known to many of us as Captain of "The Bounty", whose mutiny was put into a thrilling movie starring Charles Laughton. In 1787, Bligh's crew had mutinied in the South Seas and set him and 18 sailor adrift in a 23-foot boat with 5 days rations. After many weeks and an a superlative feat of seamanship they arrive in Timor, 4,000 miles away. After this Bligh was given a command in Nelson's fleet during the Napoleonic Wars and highly commended for valor in the Battle of Copenhagen(1801). In 1806 he arrived in NSW to succeed King as Governor.

Bligh, worse than any of his forerunners, was an outright failure. He was given to fits of bad temper and made many mistakes in judgement, but his chief shortcoming was a complete lack of tact. He seemed unable to get along with other people, especially the wealthy men and officers of the colony. Ellis sums up Bligh as follows, He was not a strong man. He was not equable in temper. He spent much of his life on ships at sea on which his word was law. He had an old salt's contempt for all land-lubbers....[He] did not know how to bring changes about without use of force. He was not thoroughly acquainted with the disposition of the people, and was deficient in policy.

Complaints and criticisms were soon being sent back to England because of his "unfair practices". In 1808 another mutiny occurred and Bligh was a virtual prisoner for a year and a half. During this time 3 local men acted as governor; all failed.

The British government saw that a complete change was needed. The corrupt and undisciplined Rum Corps must be recalled and replaced by a military force that would obey the new governor, who it was decided would be an Army officer.

D.MACQUARIE'S EARLY GOVERNORSHIP OF NSW. The 73rd Regiment of Royal Highlanders(The Black Watch) was selected to go to NSW under its commander, Lieutenant Colonel Lachlan Macquarie. On going ashore at Sydney on Jan 1, 1810, he possessed full Vice-regal power. At his back he had his own Regiment of veterans, all spic and span in new uniforms, in contrast with the slovenly Rum Corps. Bands played, sounds of rolling drums filled the parade ground, guns from ships in the harbor boomed in salute, the new Governor displayed his royal commission and spoke to the assembled crowds in a rich Scottish, soldierly voice.

"Fellow citizens and fellow soldiers." It was his intention, he said, to exercise his authority with strict justice and impartiality, and he asked for the support of all. He was "sanguine that all the dissensions and jealousies which had unfortunately existed in the colony for some time past would now terminate forever, and give way to a more becoming spirit of conciliation, harmony and unanimity among all classes and descriptions of inhabitants". He strongly recommended all classes to a strict observance of all religious duties, with regular attendance at divine worship and trusted that the magistrates and other persons in authority would exert themselves to the utmost in checking and preventing all specie of vice and immorality. As to the natives, he wished that when they came in a peaceable manner, that they would not be molested in their persons and property by anyone, but that they always be treated with kindness and attention.

From the troops he expected a most vigilant discharge of every part of their duties. And lastly, he assured all that it would be their fault if they failed to be as comfortable and happy as any other of His Majesty's subjects. But to make them, so far as he could, would be not only his duty, but would constitute his chief happiness. The honest, sober and industrious inhabitant, whether free settler or convict, would ever find him a friend and protector.

The entire address was brief, but to the point, inclusive and masterful. Its most striking feature was a note of authority which was decidedly new to those who heard him. The Rum Corps was ordered back to England and with its going the rum trade problem was on its way to solution. At the head of his tough veterans and backed by the King's commission, Macquarie was supreme over a territory 2,000 miles long, half the size of Europe and including Tahiti, New Zealand, Fiji and the Solomon Islands besides NSW.

The limited scope of this sketch makes it impossible to detail any of Macquarie's administration of over 12 years. His rule was marked by general prosperity and there were certain particular achievements which still reflect credit upon him and some of these will be mentioned.

First was the transformation he caused in the town of Sydney. It had grown up without any plan; there were no streets in the true sense and the majority of structures were crude wooden shanties with rotting walls and leaky roofs. The few stone residences belonged to the wealthy and the public buildings were inadequate. There was a surplus of liquor places; we would call Sydney a "wide open town". Pigs and other animals roamed at will, filth was everywhere with only open ditches to carry it away. A gallows tree, always ready for business, stood prominently on a sand-hill within easy carrying distance of the burial ground.

Macquarie laid straight and wide streets, he taught people to build houses of brick and stone and, erected a number of commodious and excellently planned public buildings. In this work he used the services of Francis Greenway, a brilliant architect who had been sent as a felon. Found guilty of perjury in England he was transported to NSW in 1812; he was one of the most interesting and pathetic figures in Australian history. Many of the buildings planned by Greenway and built under his supervision are still in use today. In Sydney are St. James Church, Hyde Park Convict Barrack, Government House Stables and St. Matthew's church in Windsor, St. Luke's Church in Liverpool.

Another success was constructing good roads to the outlying settlements, so farmers produce could get to Sydney. An extension of this was Macquarie's attempt to push a road over the Blue Mountains and settle the interior. This mountain range, about 40 miles from Sydney, was only about 4,000 feet but was intersected with deep, steep-sided ravines and had not been crossed in the 25 years since Sydney's founding. Macquarie encouraged 3 men, Lieut. Wm. Larson, W. Wentworth and Gregory Blaxland to search for a passage through the mountains. "Day after day the expedition forced a path through brake and briar, at intervals stopped by terrific gullies... At last the boundless campaign of the west broke upon their sight, though none of them realized at the time the nature and magnitude of what they had discovered."

The grand result of these explorations and other efforts was the opening up of vast new lands; large new areas were now available for grazing cattle and sheep and for cultivation of wheat, oats and flax. It was now necessary to build more new roads which Macquarie pushed to completion. In May, 1815, the town of Bathurst was founded and although isolated it became the center of new settlement and began to flourish. [In Aug 1988, during its International Gathering in Australia, Clan MacQuarrie was honored and feted in Bathurst. The clan also dedicated The MacQuarrie Homelands Grove (clan spelling) in Macquarie Woods (Gov.'s spelling), a NSW forestry project near Bathurst.]

Though Governor Macquarie boasted a brilliant military career and was a Major General, he was not in NSW long before he often laid aside his uniform. His preference was for plain Lachlan Macquarie, Esq., an indication of his natural inclination for civilian methods of administration.

One of his most cherished dreams was the establishment of a bank in NSW which would free the business interests there from the domination of the English banking and commercial concerns. Many in the colony opposed the idea, as did the British Government. It was not until 1816 that Macquarie was able to find an excuse to circumvent London's opposition. A committee of 15 was appointed to draft regulations and on Feb. 17, 1817, 7 Directors were elected and when the bank opened, Sgt. Murphy made the 1st deposit of 50 pounds. One of the early stockholders was Mrs. Macquarie. In those days it took 6-9 months for a letter to go to London and 6-9 for a reply to come back. So by the time officials in London told Macquarie he should not have let a bank be established, it was unfortunately too late to do much; the bank was functioning quite well. It moved ahead so rapidly that within 7 years it received a Royal Charter from England.

Ellis says, "Macquarie's great ambitions usually fruitified in time. His foundation of modern corporate financial enterprise in Australia proved more solid and enduring than it at first looked to be. If it was not true in 1817 to say, as the Governor said in his enthusiasm, that the Bank rescued the Colony from bankruptcy, its solidity was comforting on many a later occasion. In 1893 & 1929-30, if the Bank of NSW had collapsed, the whole financial structure of the Commonwealth would have been in danger." [18] The Bank of NSW [renamed WestPac Bank, indicating a wider role in the Western Pacific] is today one of the British commonwealth's strongest financial institutions. It has over 1000 branches and foreign connections, and its employees number more than the civilian population of NSW in 1810, when Macquarie came.

However, the outstanding thing about Macquarie's administration was his approach to the convict problem. In 1810, NSW's population was 11,598, most of whom were convicts who had been transported instead of serving their sentences in prison holes in Britain. Great Britain looked upon NSW as nothing but a penal colony into which it was easier to dump and forget criminals than to take care of them at home. No one expected NSW would ever become the home of a normal society.

By the end of Macquarie's term in 1821 the population had risen to 38,778. While many settlers came to the colony of free choice, the increase was mainly due to 21,726 prisoners who had been sent there. Convicts who had served out their time were called "emancipists", many of whom chose to remain in NSW instead of facing the stigma of being a returned convict at home. Some of the emancipists became wealthy; one, Simeon Lord, was the richest man in the Colony. His factories and stores were the largest in the Antipodes and his sailing vessels were known in every port of the East. Another, Andrew Thompson, occupied positions of trust and was outstanding in substance and popularity.

But in the eyes of most free settlers, convicts were scum and emancipists very little better. That many seemed to have reformed made little difference. "Once a criminal, always a criminal." One of the difficult questions was what should be the official policy of the Government toward convicts, especially toward emancipists; these two classes made up more than 2/3 of the Colony's population. Macquarie had very firm opinions and his philosophy was very liberal and advanced for that day.

To appreciate the radicalness of his views and to understand why he was so bitterly opposed by his superiors in British Government, even Church dignitaries, one must see how criminals were treated at the start of the 19th century by a civilization called Christian. Punishments were very severe. On the statute books of England the death penalty was prescribed for more than 100 offenses. Early in the 19th century a boy of 7 was hanged at Tyburn for stealing a shawl from his aunt. Prisons were hell-holes of disease and corruption. Sentences were often unjust and always harsh. Besides filthy land prisons, there were prison ships anchored in ports, laden with their miserable freight.

Movement toward prison reform was initiated by John Howard, Sheriff of Bedfordshire, in 1774. Stirred by conditions in his own country, he crusaded to expose inhuman treatment of prisoners not only in England but all over Europe. The transportation by which prisoners of all ages and both sexes were shipped off to the American Colonies, the West Indies and NSW was regarded as a happy solution. It got criminals out of "decent society" into a segregated society where they could be treated by wholesale methods. People convinced themselves that the transportation system was a humane step toward greater security for society.

Macquarie's purpose and policy were more humanitarian and remedial in spirit. He believed colonies such as NSW should not exist solely to mete out punishment in a spirit of revenge and retaliation, but should, at least, include rehabilitation and reform. When this was accomplished, he thought, the offender should be restored to full rights as a citizen and not penalized for the rest of his life. The debt to society had been paid.

Many of the NSW prisoners were not hardened and incorrigible criminals, at least at first. Many of their offenses were little more than misdemeanors. Some had been transported for stealing carp out of someone else's pool, marrying clandestinely, stealing or destroying a plant worth more than 5 shillings, catching a rabbit after sundown, filching a pie or forging postal franks. A navel surgeon named Redern, aged 19, was transported for life for advising some mutineers to stick together. Some offenses were political such as expressing opinions that were opposed to those in power. Scottish martyrs were sentenced for urging more voice and influence in the Parliament for the common people.

It would be erroneous to assume that all those sent to NSW were petty offenders. Many were complete rascals who had been criminals for years. But all were thrown together in a common heap and treated as enemies of society. All were outlaws and were outside the protection of the law because they had been accused, tried and found guilty. They really had no rights as we understand it today.

Ellis gives this description of convicts living under Macquarie's rule: "When they became part of a community which looked much like other communities. No broad arrows marked their dress, save for those who had added new crimes to their record... They seemed like other men and women at the first casual glance, and often they were freer in supposed captivity than they had been in their London slums and cellars... The men received blue kersey jackets, raven pantaloons, woolen caps: a frock for summer wear with trousers or breeches: or even gaudy uniforms which a frugal Government had retrieved from defeats inflicted on continental foes in Europe. The women wore brown jackets and petticoats... The convicts dwelt, not in prison cells, but in lodgings in the town. They were to be seen wandering in the morning to the lumberyard, public buildings, or gravel-pits and quarries where their work lay... Their work was of an infinite variety... They built every church and other public buildings... but upon their shoulders there fell the shadow of the lash and gallows... The worst of the convict women were vile... but this was far from being true of all. Some of the women became decided influences for good. Marriages took place among the prisoners and these often had a wholesome and stabilizing effect."

It was Macquarie's hope and plan that NSW should in time become a fully-developed part of the Empire, and not continue merely a penal colony. History has certainly justified his vision and labors. He was realistic enough to admit that many convicts would never be reformed by any amount of fair and humane treatment. Some had sunk so low they were beyond reach. There were times when the Governor was too inclined to overlook this. In those days there were no social case-workers as we have today. There were too many offenders for individuals to receive much attention, but even more fundamental was the public attitude that criminals were not worth saving.

Macquarie was willing to give an accused the benefit of the doubt and to help him if he showed any real desire to improve. There is no doubt that his broad-mindedness and clemency were taken advantage of by unrepentant persons. This was the source of much criticism that found it way back to England. But on the whole the results of this policy were rewarding to a remarkable degree. Some emancipists became policemen, school teachers, and civil service clerks. A few actually became judges.

The Governor saw no social incongruity in inviting some of the emancipists to attend formal dinners at Government House. There they sat with citizens who, supposedly, were always law-abiding. Some of the righteous found it exceedingly difficult emotionally to accept this implication of social equality of convicts with themselves. In a few instances the Governor was accused of showing partiality to emancipists who had differences with free settlers. The basic assumption of those opposed to his policy was that criminals were forever beyond social redemption.

E. Growing Opposition and Resignation. During his entire administration Macquarie was popular with the majority of the people. They admired his initiative and unselfish spirit with which he worked day and night, doing the best for the interests of the Colony as he saw them, never for personal advantage. But it was not long before some prominent people began to oppose him at nearly every turn and attempted to undermine his standing with his superiors in London.

The chief opponent of the convict policy was a churchman, the Reverend Samuel Marsden. The reverend gentleman had come to NSW as some sort a missionary and received funds from the English Church for his work. With headquarters in Paramatta, 16 miles west of Sydney, he was really a religious snob and the leader of upper-crust exclusionists. He opposed every measure favorable to the emancipists. For some reason he had strong influence in high circles in Church and State in England.

In Feb 1810, Marsden returned from London where he met with the Archbishop of Canterbury and even the King. He came near having a stroke on learning that Macquarie appointed him to serve with two emancipists, Simeon Lord and Andrew Thompson, on a board to control the new Paramatta Turnpike. Marsden declared he believed the Governor's purpose was "to raise one class and lower the other, and to bring bond and free to a common level". He had been displeased from the first by Macquarie's appointment and contended that a civilian should have been chosen rather than a military man, because the Colony needed a Governor who understood agriculture. This was reasonable, but Macquarie knew a great deal about agriculture and was interested in promoting and improving it. This grievance persisted with Marsden and his satellites.

Governor Macquarie in his treatment of prisoners and emancipists was concerned not for punctilious observance of taboos, but for the moral and spiritual rehabilitation of people for their own sakes as human beings. This was not the first time, nor the last in world history, when ecclesiastical officials have stood for philosophy that was less than Christian. Another example of inconsistency was that William Wilberforce, the great champion for abolition of English slavery, was also sympathetic to Marsden's views on emancipists in NSW. He was torn between his favorable personal impression of Macquarie and the tales about him he kept hearing from Marsden.

Two other opponents of Macquarie's policies were the brothers Ellis & Jeffrey Bent. When Macquarie and his wife came to NSW, Ellis Bent was on the same ship. He had been appointed Judge Advocate, or Chief Judge, though he was only 26 year old. His frame was "too heavy for his uncertain knees", and he suffered frequently from pleurisy and rheumatic fever. He also disagreed with Macquarie about the scope of the governor's powers. In 1814, when another Judge was needed, the Governor recommended that Jeffrey Bent be sent out to NSW.

With Jeffrey's arrival the quarrel grew more bitter. A year younger than Ellis, he was already a barrister of several years and never failed to tell his hearers so. He was deeply offended that he did not receive a knighthood with his appointment as Judge. Throughout his term he claimed that he was not subject to the Governors's authority in any respect, but subordinate only to the Colonial Secretary at home; that his duties as Judge were separate and independent of the Governor's; that he and the Governor were equals and that they would have no discussions except of that basis.

Macquarie on the other hand, with long military experience and in accord with his commission as Viceroy, felt he represented the full authority of the King and ranked as head of the Government. Several of the practicing lawyers in NSW were emancipists; some had practiced in England, others became lawyers after finishing their terms. Bent opposed all ex-convicts practicing in courts, no matter what their previous training, experience or sincerity of reform. He contended that having been convicted, they should be disbarred forever from practicing law. In short, Bent was totally and bitterly opposed to Macquarie's convict policy.

Jeffrey Bent charged the Governor with despotism and claimed judges should be as independent and important as he had been in England. To this Macquarie objected. It is doubtful that Bent's ideas were suited to a colony such as NSW was then; they presupposed a more settled and peaceable order. At last Macquarie wrote a personal letter to Lord Bathurst, the Colonial Secretary. Accusing the Bents of unworthy and vindictive motives, he delivered an ultimatum on July 1815:

Under all these circumstances, it is utterly impossible that I can act with the Messieurs Bent without a total abandonment of the principles by which I have been actuated and acted upon since my first taking charge of this government; and consequently it now becomes absolutely necessary for the good of the Colony(which it is my ardent desire to leave flourishing and happy) that they or I should be removed from it.... I therefore most respectfully take this liberty to solicit, that, in the event of the conduct of Messieurs Bent being approved by His Majesty's ministers, your Lordship will do me the favor to move His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent, to be graciously pleased to accept my resignation as Governor of the Territory.[18].

The resignation was not accepted. Ellis Bent died in Nov 1815 on a trip to Europe for the restoration of his health. This left Jeffrey Bent to carry on alone the feud with the Governor. But Jeffrey had little influence in NSW. The British Government wrote he should have done what Macquarie told him, then dismissed him from his judgeship; no hesitation or quibbling. The Government wanted no more rebellion in NSW.

But while the Government discharged Bent, it did not ignore what he and other critics were saying against Macquarie. There seemed be a growing feeling among the authorities at home that the colony should have more self-rule. In addition to the prisoners sent for punishment, many settlers came voluntarily to make their own fortunes in the new land. The number of free men increased greatly during Macquarie's time as did the number of emancipists who did not return to England.

It was argued that all these free men and women should not be ruled permanently by a military despot who had been appointed primarily to govern prisoners. Some also said that Macquarie was not fair and impartial in his decisions. He did make mistakes which were easy to criticize. Therefore the Government sent out a Commissioner to study the situation at length and from every angle, to find out what was going on, and with authority to recommend steps he might deem necessary.

The man chosen for this task was John Bigge. He came and stayed in the Colony for 1 1/2 years, from Sep 1819 to Feb 1821. Chosen by Earl Bathurst on the strength of 3 years governmental experience in the West Indies, he was supposed to have a fair and unprejudiced mind. His salary in NSW was 1000 pounds a year more than that of Macquarie himself. In case there should be need, Bigge was given authority to override the Governor on any matter. Macquarie's only recourse was to appeal to the Colonial Office, but remember that it took a least a year for a letter to go to and return from London.

With the Commissioner was Mr. Scott, who was designated "official heir to Mr. Bigge's Commissionership, so that if the latter were to die on the voyage or be destroyed by his enemies, Mr Scott would succeed to his mantle and hold the inquiry". Thus Macquarie was subjected to an almost unbearable humiliation before the supposedly impartial investigation had even begun.

The inquiry was prejudiced from the first, since Bigge's chief friends and associates in NSW were the "exclusionists", i.e., those who wished to exclude the emancipists from positions of influence and the social life of the Colony. Most of the exclusionists were free settlers or of the military class, many became livestock graziers. They took pains to cultivate the Commissioner and impressed on him that the affairs of NSW should be conducted in their interests rather than the welfare of the emancipists. Were they not the real backbone of the Colony? The result was that Bigge's report was not commendatory of Macquarie's policies.

Bigge objected to the extensive road building and erection of public buildings which Macquarie had carried on. The Commissioner himself spent a lot of money from the public treasury on regal journeys from one part of the Colony to another, accompanied by a large and expensive retinue. But, was he not the Royal Commissioner. Yet he criticized Macquarie's expenditures for buildings on the ground they were "uselessly magnificent, even sumptuous". These buildings which are still in use today do not give the impression of being extravagant, but beautiful and serviceable. [Rodney McQuarrie, is almost entirely correct about this, but in the case of the Government 'Stables' (now the Music Conservatory in Sydney), an objective observer might agree with Bigge that these were sumptuous stables. One story is that Macquarie requested permission to extensively repair the Government House and Stables. London refused to allow repairs to the House, but said the stables could be fixed up. Macquarie, canny Scotchman that he was, fixed up some very elegant stables.]

In Dec 1817, Macquarie wrote to Lord Bathurst that he wanted to be relieved of his position. When he came to NSW in 1810 he expected to stay 2 or 3 years, but he had been held there by the tremendous things he saw needed to be done. Unlike previous governors, Macquarie had a vision of the Colony's future and of his duty to remain at the task, that had not let him stop and go home, even for a vacation. He kept on year after year, determined to leave behind something better than a penal colony. He later learned that his resignation had not even been presented to the Prince Regent and that he had been kept in a job he was sincerely trying to relinquish. In Mar 1818 he pointed out to the Colonial Office that he had resigned, but his letter was ignored. "The great folk in Downing Street" had not given him "the least hint" how long they intended to keep him in NSW.

In Jan 1820, Macquarie reached his 60th year. Since coming to NSW he had never been out of sight of convicts nor had much leisure, in many ways as much a prisoner as those sent out for punishment. The presence of the Commissioner and the way he was carrying out his investigation were very depressing and demoralizing. Lord Bathurst paid no heed to his pleadings that he be relieved of his responsibilities. Macquarie had about come to the conclusion that the minister at home thought he was not sincere in asking to be relieved, in spite of his long efforts to convince them. They seemed to think a delay of 3 or 4 years more would mean nothing to him. On top of all this, he had not been really well for years. Of late he was suffering from more frequent attacks of illness that sapped his strength and depressed his spirit.

E. RETURN TO THE HOMELAND. At long last Macquarie's term came to an end with the appointment of Thomas Brisbane, also a Scotsman and soldier, as Governor. In Feb 1822, Macquarie performed his last service in NSW by welcoming the new Governor.

The great majority of people were genuinely grieved to see Macquarie leave after all he had done for them through the years. One young reporter wrote, "The shores were lined with spectators innumerable, but on each countenance was the indication of a feeling too big, too sincere for utterance." The man of Mull ceased to be the ruler over half a continent. He had become one of Britain's hundreds of burnt-out Viceroys, who were ever returning home, soon to be forgotten in the press and excitement of younger ones going away.

F.L.Wood[61] sums up Macquarie's achievements as follow: He had always used his great powers to make the Colony prosper. He had given it good roads and fine buildings. He had encouraged education and set up its 1st bank. Finally, he had done his best to make people forget that NSW was a convict colony, and to persuade all to become equal citizens of the new country. Of course he made mistakes. Every constructive statesman will sometimes make mistakes, especially if he is a despot controlling the whole country and trying to solve all its problems. Some of his actions were as unpopular as those of Bligh. But no one questioned his good intentions and public spirit, and unlike Bligh, he did not go out of his way to make enemies. He did lose his temper easily, and he was always courteous in a stately way. He was a kindly gentleman, and his personal charm won the affection of many who thought his public policy disastrous.

The Governor, his wife Elizabeth and their son Lachlan returned to their estate at Gruline. Their house there was very small and intended to be only a temporary home until a larger mansion could be built. He had no room to call his own and no privacy, not even to write a letter.

Shaking with ague Macquarie went about his estate, setting out plantings and making plans for the new house. Every day he went by horseback over the poor Mull roads to the tiny settlement of Salen, 2-3 miles away. He was village magistrate and active in the community in other ways. [He had been earlier responsible for the town's founding.] He was failing steadily in strength and health and was often in pain. It was plain to his wife and those who knew him that he was having forebodings about the future.

He went to Tobermory, 13 miles away, and paid all his debts, settled all his business affairs and made calls of civility or kindness which he felt should be done. Clear plans for the future development of Jarvisfield, which his son was to inherit, were made.

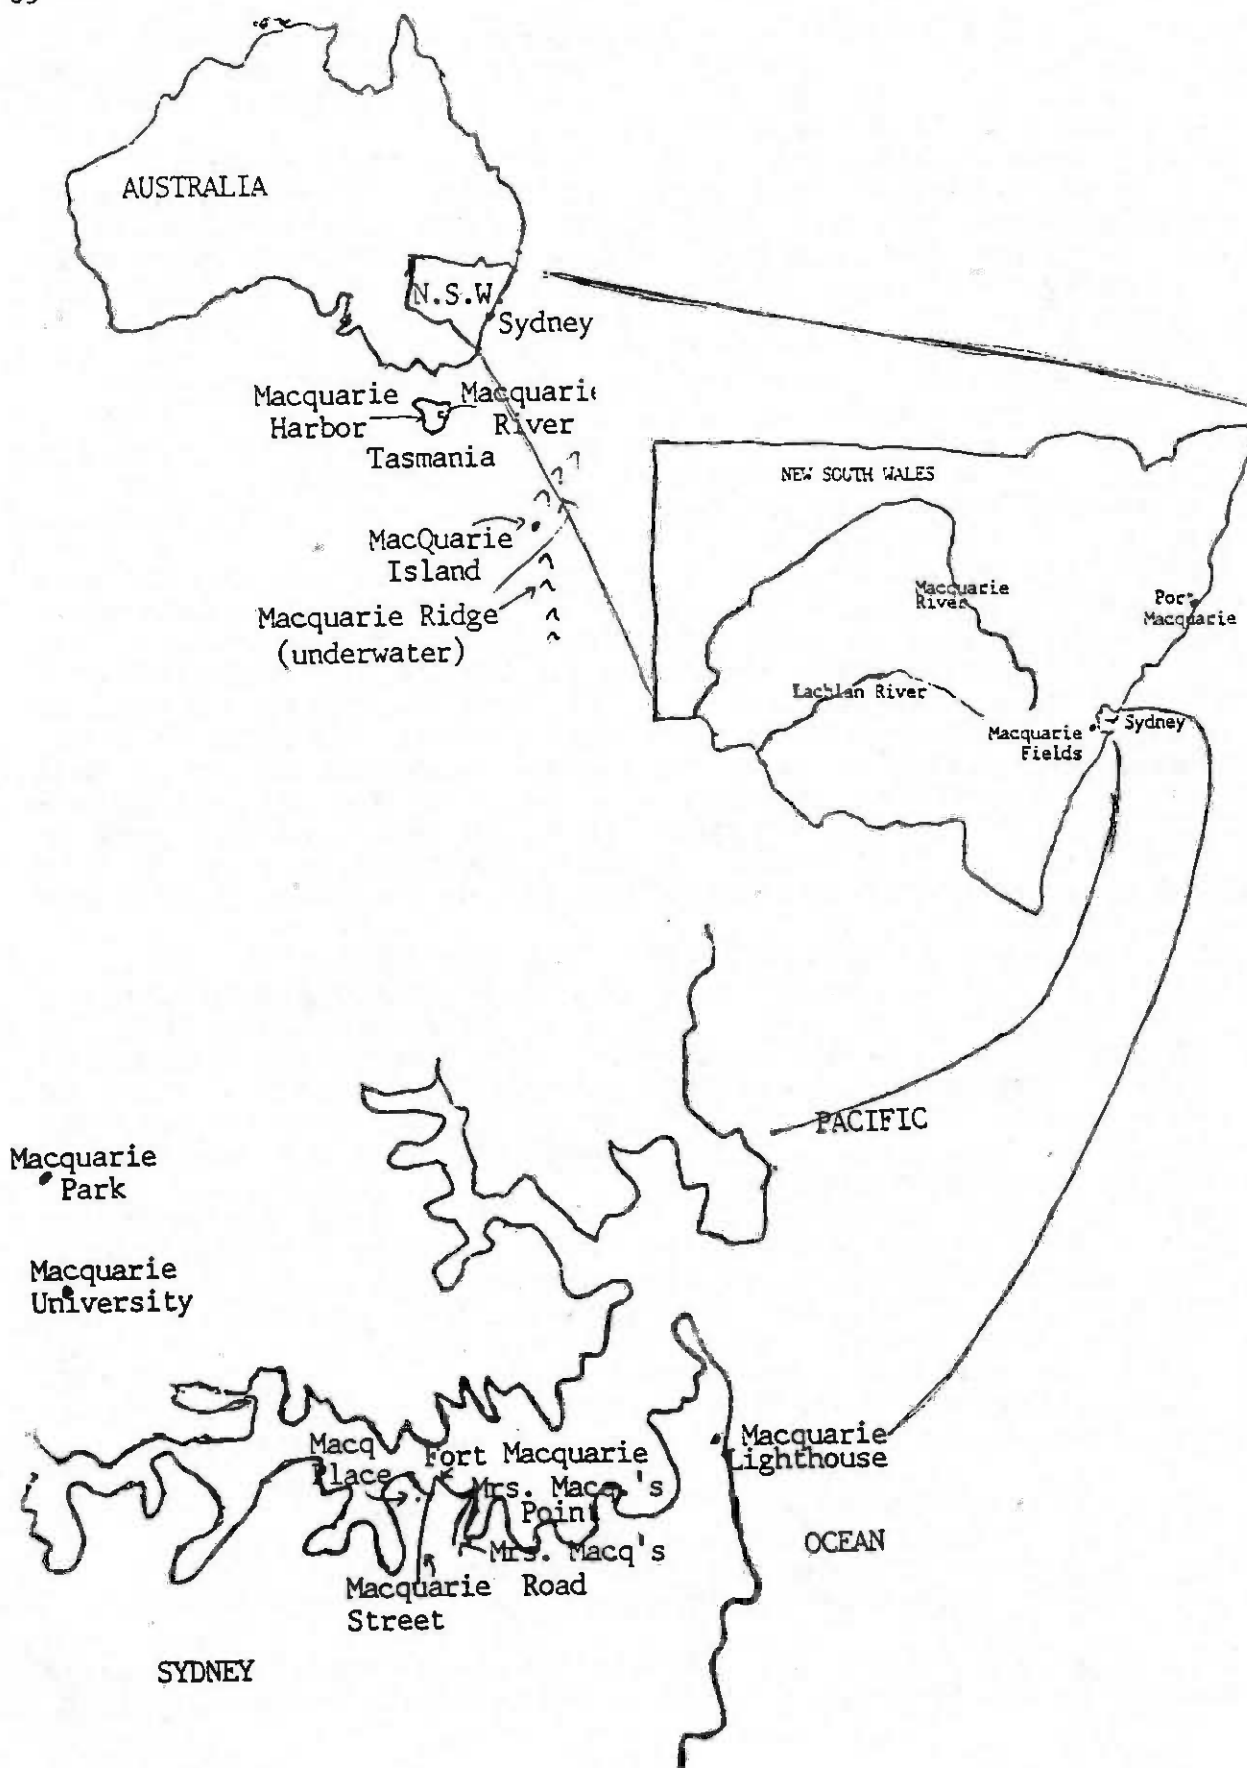

In Mar 1824 he was urged to come to London and decided to make the trip alone, leaving his wife and son at Gruline. He acted as if he was going away with no intention of returning. After a long voyage from Leith he reached London on Apr 24 and took lodgings at 49 Duke St., only a stone's throw from St. James Palace. He called on Earl Bathurst, the Duke of York, met the King at Carlton House and called on many acquaintances in winding up various business and government affairs. He negotiated for the establishment of a church in his village Salen. He was told his pension would be fixed at 1000 pounds, a smallness he attributed to the insidious influence of the Bigge Report; he received no further mark of the King's approval.

In a few weeks he became fatally ill and died 1 Jul 1824, in lodging that cost 34 shillings per week-- this man who tamed a new land for the Crown and ruled over it in statesmanlike way for 12 years. He was 64 years old. The Government he served so illustriously and unselfishly for half a century took no official notice. The Duke of Wellington, his old commander, and Earl Bathurst each sent an empty carriage for the procession to the wharf, but neither was present.

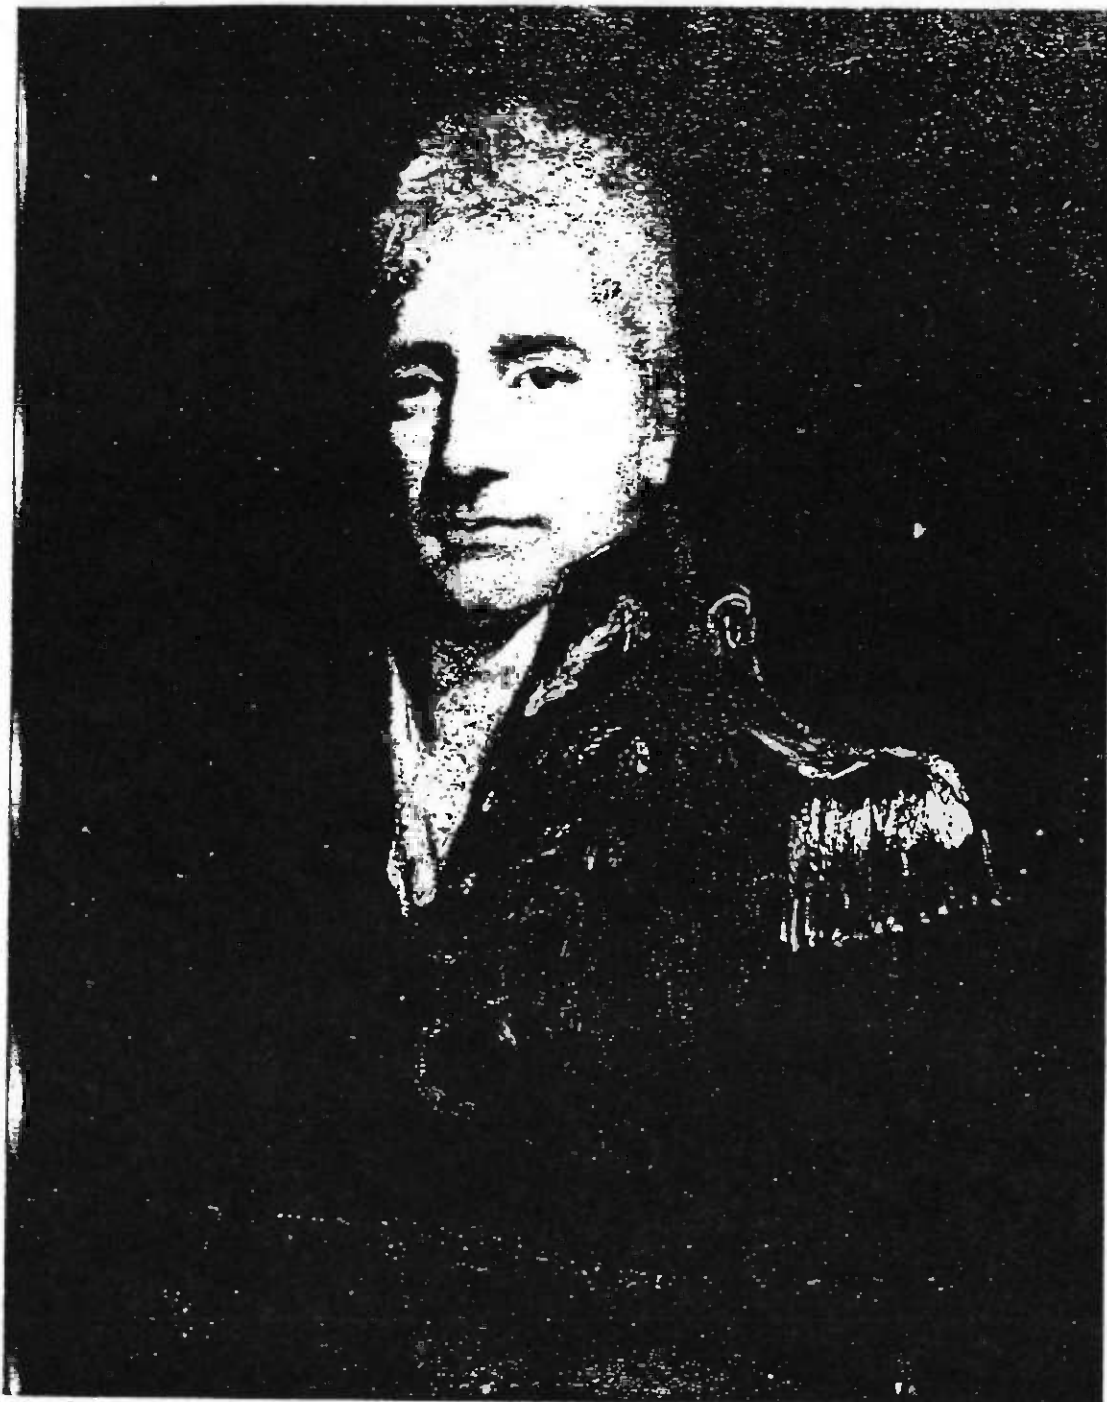

Macquarie was buried on his estate at Gruline and sometime later a granite tomb [now maintained by the Australian Government] was erected for the remains of him, his wife Elizabeth, their son Lachlan and little daughter. Appropriately the name Australia was first carved on a public monument on this mausoleum. He had been the first to champion the use of this name instead of NSW. [On news of his death reaching Australia, emancipists and their children, remembering his kindness toward them, toasted him:

Macquarie was the prince of men,
Australia's pride and joy.
We'll never see his like again,
Here's to the old Viceroy.].

Within a few years the emancipists and their descendants became the dominant force in Australian politics and Macquarie's memory was never allowed to grow dim in the continent to which he had given his most productive years. Visitors to Australia today see his name widely: Macquarie Street, Macquarie River, Macquarie Mountains, Macquarie Lighthouse, Port Macquarie, Macquarie Bank, Macquarie University and his name is spoken day and night over the great radio network named for him. Although of some the names date to his stay there, most were initiated by the Australians themselves in token of the high esteem in which he was held.

Lieutenant-Colonel Lachlan Macquarie, aged 44

Cairn unveiled in Macquarie Woods, Bathurst, NSW by Clan MacQuarrie, 6 Aug 88.

One face of the above cairn.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, REFERENCES & SOURCES FOR MORE INFORMATION

1. Acts of the Lords of Council in Civil Cases(Edinburgh and London, (1478-1498,1839)
2. Adam & Innes: The Clans, Septs, and Regiments of the Scottish Highlands(6th Ed. Edinburgh, 1960)
3. Anderson, William: The Scottish Nation (1859, 1863)
4. Archeology of Scotland
5. Barnard: History of Australia(Angus & Robertson, Sydney,1963)
6. ----- Macquaries's World(Cambridge Univ. Press, N.Y.
7. Behold Iona-- a guide book(The Iona Community)
8. Black, Geo.F.: Surnames of Scotland, their Origin, Meaning and History(New York Public Library)
9. Boswell, James: Journal of Tour to the Hebrides(with Samuel Johnson
10. Brown, Peter Hume: History of Scotland(7 volumes)
11. Burton, John Hill: History of Scotland(1870)
12. Campbell, Grace: Highland Heritage(Duell, Sloan & Pierce, N.Y. 1962)
13. Campbell, Reginald J: Livingstone (Dodd, Mead & Co.,NY 1962)
14. Cohen, Lizabeth: Elizabeth Macquarie, Her Life & Times (Wentworth Books, Sydney 1979)
15. Douglas, Robert: Baronage of Scotland(Constable, Edinburgh)
16. ----- Landed Gentry of Scotland
17. ----- Peerage of Scotland
18. Ellis, Malcolm H.: Lachlan Macquarie, His Life, Adventures & Times (Angus & Robertson, Sydney, 1947)
19. Encyclopediia Brittanica, 14th Ed. Articles on Scotland, Argyll, Hebrides, MacBeth, etc.
20. Exchequer Rolls of Scotland, vols.1-23, Edinburgh)
21. Farquharson, Mairead(a pseudonym): The Island of the Wolf (The Highlander, Vol 25, No 5, Sep/Oct 1987)
22. Galbraith, John: The Scotch (Houghton.Mifflin, Boston,1964
23. Gregg, W.H. Controversial Issues in Scottish History(G.P. Putnam's Sons, NY & London, 1910)
24. Hannan, Thomas B.: The Beautiful Isle of Mull
25. ----- Iona and Some Satellites(W.&R. Chambers,Ltd. London)
26. Highland Papers
27. Keltie: A History of the Scottish Highlands, Highland Clans. and Highland Regiments
28. MacCormick: The Isle of Mull
29. MacDonald: Clan Donald
30. MacGregor, A.A. Skye and the Inner Hebride(Robert Hale, Ltd. London)
31. MacKenzie, A.Mure: History of Scotland in Modern Times(W&R Chambers, Ltd. London, 1962)
32. MacKenzie, James: History of Scotland(T.Nelson & Sons, London & Edinburgh, 1902)
33. MacLean, J.P.: History of the Isle of Mull
34. MacMillan: Iona and the Ionans
35. Macquarrie, Alan: These are your people-The Clan MacQuarrie (Reprint from the Highlander)
36. Menzies, Lucy: St. Columba of Iona(The Iona Community)

37. Montalembert, Count de Monks of the West(Patrick Donohoe, Boston, 1832, 2 vols)
38. Munro, Robert W.: Lachlan MacQuarrie XVith of Ulva (Karachi Pakistan 1944)
39. -----Clan MacQuarie (Scotland's Magazine, Dec 1971)
40. ----- (Scottish Genealogist, June, 1968)
41. Pennant: A Tour of Scotland and Visit to the Hebrides, 1772
42. Registrum, etc., Edinburgh
43. Rennie, James Alan: The Scottish People, their Clans, Families and Origins (Hutchinson of London)
44. -----In the Steps of the Clansmen (Rich&Cowan, NY&London)
45. Retours: Argyll, Edinburgh
46. Scotland's Magazine, August 1966(Edinburgh)
47. Scotland's Splendor, J.B.Formen, Ed.(Wm Collinms&Sons, Glasgow & London)
48. Scott, Walter: Tales of a Grandfather
49. Semple, John Mackenzie: Culloden Field(Oban, 1964)
50. -----Stones of Iona(The Iona Community)
51. Skene, W.F.: Celtic Scotland
52. ----- Highlanders of Scotland(1837)
53. Smibert, Thomas: The Clans of Scotland
54. Spotswood, John: History of Church and State in Scotland(1851, Edinburgh)
55. Statistical Reports of Parishes of Scotland(1795)
56. Stewart, David: Sketches of Highlanders
57. Stewart, Donald: The Setts of the Scottish Tartans(Shepherd-Walwyn, London 1974)
58. Stuart and Paul: Scottish Family History
59. Turner & Finlay: The Isle of Mull, a guide to the island
60. Walker, Williston: History of the Christian Church(Scribners Sons, NY 1923)
61. Wood, F.L.W.: A Concise History of Australia(Sydney, 1943)

--

Monday 30 Sept 1816. " I talked to Secretary Campbell this day, for the first time, on the important subject of his collecting the necessary materials and information for writing a correct and impartial 'History of New South Wales' - alias 'Australia' - and he has promised me to take this subject into his serious consideration." Diary of Gov. Lachlan Macquarie

Thus did Australia receive its name.

--

PART 3 SONG, POEMS, ETC. ASSOCIATED WITH MAC QUARRIES

A. Lord Ullin's Daughter. In the late 1700s, Thomas Campbell (1777-1844) was a private tutor for a family on the Isle of Mull. While there he heard many stories and tales of the island. One particularly struck his fancy; he elaborated and romanticised it in a poem "Lord Ullin's Daughter". P.A. Macnab[The Isle of Mull] says the original story involved a daughter of Allan Maclean of Knock(near Gruline on the south shore of Mull) who was eloping with a MacQuarrie man(maybe not the chief?). Since the current road from Gruline over the hills to present day Ulva Ferry likely did not exist, they would have fled south along the level shore of Mull to a point near Inch Kenneth, where there was a ferry to Ulva. Apparently Campbell changed names to protect the guilty and today there is some dispute as to how much of the poem is fact.

LORD ULLIN'S DAUGHTER

*A Chieftain, to the Highlands bound,
Cries, "Boatman, do not tarry!
And I'll give thee a silver pound,
To row us o'er the ferry."*

*"Now, who be ye, would cross Lochgyle,
This dark and stormy water?"
"Oh, I'm the chief of Ulva's isle.
And this Lord Ullin's daughter."*

*"And fast before her father's men
Three days we've fled together,
For should he find us in the glen.
My blood would stain the heather."*

*"His horsemen hard behind us ride;
Should they our steps discover,
Then who would cheer my bonny bride,
When they have slain her lover?"*

*Out spoke the hardy Highland wight,
"I'll go, my chief--I'm ready:
It is not for your silver bright,
But for your winsome lady:"*

*"And by my word! the bonny bird
In danger shall not tarry;
So though the waves are raging white,
I'll row you o'er the ferry."*

*By this the storm grew loud apace,
The water-wraith was shrieking;
And in the scowl of heaven each face
Grew dark as they were speaking."*

Grave of Lord
Ullin's Daughter, overlooking the storm prone Loch.
Ulva Ferry.

Gov. Macquarie's home, Gruline.

*But still as wilder blew the wind,
And as the night grew drearer,
Adown the glen rode armed men,
Their trampling sounded nearer.*

*"Oh haste thee, haste!" the lady cries,
"Though tempests round us gather,
I'll meet the raging of the skies,
But not an angry father."*

*The boat has left a stormy land,
A stormy sea before her.
When, oh! too strong for human hand,
The tempest gathered o'er her.*

*And still they rowed amidst the roar
Of waters fast prevailing:
Lord Ullin reached that fatal shore--
His wrath was changed to wailing.*

*For sore dismayed, through storm and shade,
His child he did discover:
One lovely arm she stretched for aid,
And one was round her lover.*

*"Come back! come back!" he cried in grief,
"Across this stormy water:
And I'll forgive your Highland chief,
My daughter!--Oh, my daughter!"*

*'Twas vain: the loud waves lashed the shore,
Return or aid preventing:
The waters wild went o'er his child--
And he was left lamenting.*

The traditional gravesite for Lord Ullin's daughter (nee Miss Maclean?) is on the seashore below Oskamull near Ulva Ferry. During its 1985 Gathering on Mull, Clan MacQuarrie dedicated a Celtic Cross bearing the above poem over the grave. (A half acre around the grave is now owned by a member of Clan MacQuarrie.)

Some residents of Mull dispute the authenticity of the gravesite and question whether the poem has any historical basis. Many others accept it and it seems to have a long tradition attached to it. The previous owners told this editor that when they moved there (1960s?) they found a slate tomb stone with a faint date scratched in it; maybe 1729. The slab is still there but I could make out no date on it.

Anyway, it is a beautiful poem with certainly a message for parents who try too hard to shelter their children. Clearly Lord Ullin (Maclean) must have been unreasonable, since any father should be honored to have his daughter marry a MacQuarrie. Or maybe he knew even then that we were stubborn, contrary beings.

Thomas Campbell went on to become a very famous British poet and is buried in Westminster Abbey in London.

B. Bagpipe Music--The Canadian MacQuarries. The following March is from "The Edinburgh Collection of Highland Bagpipe Music published by David Glen, Edinburgh, about 1900. Part XI p 32. A copy of this collection is in the Music annex of the Edinburgh City Library.

March. — "The Canadian MacQuarries."

John Mc Lenn

48.

2nd

The Edinburgh Collection Part XI.

[The Bull (or The Army) Speckled Red]
AN TARBH (NO AN T-ARM) BREAC DEARG

The Red Speckled Army

THIS tune is to be found in the MSS. of Donald MacDonald, senior, and Angus MacKay. Donald MacDonald calls it "Se'n t'arm mharbh me," and has the following note:—" 'An t'arm breachd derg, se'n t'arm mharbh me.' These words describe the appearance of an army at a distance. The composer of this rattling march was one of the pipers who was at the battle of Maolroy, and he says it was the army that killed him; which is the literal meaning of the Gaelic above."

Angus MacKay gives three names. Above the musical score in his MS. the name is "An t-arm Breachd Dearg" (The British Army). In the English index it is "The Brittish (sic) (or 'Red Speckled') Army." In a separate note, which gives specimens of Canntaireachd notation, he calls the tune "Tarbh Brach Derg."

The late Colonel Greenhill Gardyne, of Glenforsa, communicated in 1909 the following legend in support of his belief that the correct name is "An Tarbh Breac Dearg." It was related to him by Mr. Peter MacDonald, Sheil Bridge, Acharacle.

"Ronald MacAilean Og MacDonald (of Traigh in Morar, I think he was) was on his way to see Lochiel. The Camerons took a vicious bull from Loch Arkaig side, and sent him on in front of Ronald to the river Sgaithéal. The bull appeared very fierce, and Ronald said it was better to avoid him, but his gille said 'I would not like them (the Camerons) to say that we ran away from him.' So Ronald and the bull attacked one another in the river. Ronald killed the bull, and twisted off his two horns, and made the lad carry them. He composed a piobaireachd by the side of Lochiel, and played it for the first time when he was nearing Achnacarry Castle. When he returned home, he went to see MacDonald of Keppoch, and played the tune to him. The Laird of Keppoch asked for the tune to be a Welcome tune for himself, and Ronald gave it."

This Ronald, presumably, is to be identified with the reputed composer of "The Vaunting" and "The Finger Lock."

The name "An Tarbh Breac Dearg" is to be found in the lists of competitors in the early competitions of the Highland Society, for example, in 1814 in that of Murdoch Maclean, pipe maker, Glasgow, late piper to Ardgour.

Another name by which this tune has been called is "The MacQuarrie's Gathering" (vide Ceol Mor, revised index).

The setting printed is Angus MacKay's, which differs from MacDonald's in the following particulars:—

MacDonald omits the Thumb Variation I.

- (1) MacDonald has a G E D cadence on the notes marked thus.
- (2) These B's are C in MacDonald.
- (3) MacDonald's grace-note on these notes is a single high G.
- (4) Here MacDonald's note is B with a G E D cadence.
- (5) On this E MacDonald has a G F grace-note.

MacDonald has twelve bars instead of sixteen in Var. II., and in the Doublings of Var. II., Var. III., Taorluath and Crunluath. The lines are not marked and it is difficult to say which bars of MacKay's are omitted.

MacDonald's Crunluath notes, both in the Singling and in the Doubling, are open.

An Tarbh (no An t-Arm) Breac Dearg

(The Red Speckled Army)

I. UBLAR.

Line 1st.

2nd.

3rd.

II. VAR. I.

Line 1st.

2nd.

3rd.

III. VAR. II.

Line 1st.

2nd & 3rd.

IV. VAR III. (V) AND V DOUBLING (V)

Line 1st.

2nd & 3rd.

VI. VAR. IV (V) AND VII DOUBLING (V')

Line 1st.

2nd & 3rd.

VIII. TAORLUATH (T) & IX DOUBLING (T')

Line 1st.

2nd & 3rd.

X. CRUNLUATH (C) & XI DOUBLING (C')

Line 1st.

2nd & 3rd.

Abbreviations used.

Written.

Played.

D. Welcome to Ulva. For the MacQuarrie Clan Gathering on the Isle of Mull in 1985, Jean Spence, 58 Edzell St., Broughty Ferry, Dundee, Scotland wrote the following song for the Clan and gave use of it to the Clan.

WELCOME TO ULVA

1. No matter how far you have wandered away,
To what distant shore you belong,
Until you are able to come back some day
Remember the words of this song:

Chorus Welcome home, welcome home,
Although it is just for awhile;
And when you depart, may you keep in your heart
The warmest of welcomes form Ulva's green isle.

2. It's many a year since you left Scotland's shore
And sailed o'er the silvery main.
Until you are able to come back once more
Remember this lilting refrain: Chorus

3. You've gathered together a moment, and then
You'll go, though the way may be long;
Until you are able to come back again
Remember the words of this song: Chorus

Welcome to Ulva—

Jean Spence

Handwritten musical score for "Welcome to Ulva" in 3/4 time. The score consists of four staves. The first two staves contain the main melody with lyrics "s, | s, d m | s f m | m r d | r - s, | s, t, r | f s - . l | s - - | - -". The third staff is labeled "CHORUS" and contains the melody for "Welcome home, welcome home". The fourth staff contains the final line of the melody with lyrics "s | s l s | m - d | l, d l, | s - s, | s, d m | s f m | r m r | d -". The notation includes various musical symbols such as notes, rests, and bar lines.

copyright 1985 Jean Spence, with rights given
to Clan MacQuarrie

E. Salute to the MacQuarries. Also for the 1985 Gathering on Mull, Jean Spence wrote this poem for the MacQuarries:

SALUTE TO THE MACQUARRIES

MacQuarries of Ulva - a grand Scottish name
A name that forever will last
Now let's draw aside the veil of the years
And take a long look at the past.

For 900 years they were the chiefs
Of the smallest of clans- but the proudest
The bravest in battle, the biggest in heart
And when they'd a wee dram- aye the loudest.

They were real friendly with the Lords of the Isles
MacDonalds and MacQuarries were buddies
They raided the mainland and harried there foes,
And rustled their cows and their cuddies.

They fought with MacDonald and turned to MacLean
They argued and tempers would flare
But when Scotland was threatened with Sassenach foes
The MacQuarries were first to be there.

They fought against Cromwell- sensible folk,
And in Bloody and horrible strife,
The chief of MacQuarrie and each of his men
For King and for Scotland, gave up his life.

Over the years those who were left
Played various parts in our story
Some were one side- some the other, but Always they fought for clan glory.

Lachlan MacQuarrie, the 1st of the chiefs,
Found his bank account well in the red.
So deeply in debt and pockets to let
"I'll have to sell Ulva," he said.

So the island was then in some stranger's hands
A heart-rending sight to see
Lachlan grew pensive, was cut off in his prime
And died at 103.

Lachlan Macquarie, most famous of all
Governor of New South Wales did become
Got stuck into Sydney, cleaned up the place
And banished the odour of rum.

Just as well he stayed in Australia I think
It would have been a bit risky
To come back to Ulva and attempt the impossible
Banish the odour of whiskey.

It wasn't all fighting and quarrels and wars
 There was love and romance to be found
 But Lord Ullin's daughter and Ulva's young chief
 While crossing the loch, sadly drowned.

Then came the clearances, long bitter years
 When sheep, more than men, were of worth,
 MacQuarries and others were put off the land
 And wandered the face of the earth.

At universities the MacQuarries did well
 They were bright, this I do not deny
 Perhaps this accounts for reports I have heard
 That their foreheads were remarkably high.

MacQuarrie today is still a great name
 An M.P. and professor I hear
 There's Tam and there's Jock- "Who are they?" you might ask,
 Well, they just hand around at the pier.

Now we've dealt with events of the past
 Let's remember where all this began
 It started right here- on this tiny isle,
 Ulva- still the heart of the clan.

We know with Australia it cannot compare
 Being that wee bit smaller, you'll find
 The sun's not so hot, and it's seen not a lot.
 And the rain drives you out of your mind.

Now our American and Canadian friends
 Like the bright city lights, so I hear.
 There are not lights on Ulva- no, wait, I am wrong
 There's one shining down on the pier.

Now gathering on Ulva in August 85
 Are MacQuarries from far distant parts
 And we hope when you leave that the memories this week
 Will forever remain in your hearts.

To finish this verse, may I lapse into Scots
 So afore ye a' gang awa'
 Here's tae MacQuarries, a' o'er the world
 Frae Ulva- a sincere 'Slainte Va'.

copyright 1985 Jean Spence, with rights given
 to Clan MacQuarrie

F. MacQUARRIE TARTAN(S) OR PLAID(S). Clan MacQuarrie is almost universally associated with 1 tartan, but in reality over the years 4 tartans have been linked to the clan. We will give below the design or sett of each of these. Many Americans use the word plaid to denote the checked or crossed pattern used by the Highland Scotch on their fabrics. Modern inhabitants of Scotland are quick to point out that tartan "is the correct term." This appears to be another case where ancient words with the same meaning have evolved differently in different parts of the world. (see Scotch in Preface). Much of the information in this part is from Donald C. Stewart[The Setts of the Scottish Tartans].

Since about 1886 the standard MacQuarrie plaid has consisted of 5 red(R) and 5 green(G) bands of varying thickness. The numbers refer to the lowest number of thread counts that can reproduce the sett, but it is the proportions that are important:

32R 2G 2R 2G 8R 24G 8R 2G 2R 2G repeat.

Another MacQuarrie tartan dating at least from about 1850 introduces blue(B) and light blue(Lb) with the red and green:

2 2 12 6 2 12 2 12 12 2 2 2 2 2 12 12 2 12 2 6 12 2
R Lb R B R G R G R B R Lb R B R G R G R B R Lb repeat.

Even earlier(1831) we have:

4R 2Lb 32R 24B 8R 32G 12R 32G 8R 24B 32R 2Lb repeat.

And lastly about 1815:

4 6 4 104 4 4 56 4 84 4 4 6 4 6 4 4 84 4 56 4 4 104 4 6
G R G R G R B R G R G R G R G R G R B R G R G R repeat.

The dates given are when the tartans appeared in a book; we have no way of knowing how much earlier they were in use. One would think that the simpler plaids might be older, with the more elaborate ones being more recent. If this is so, perhaps the usually accepted MacQuarrie tartan is most genuine.

Back to tartan vs plaid. Both terms are in print back in the 16th century. King James V bought some "Heland tertane". And "women of the country [wore] cloaks...of 2 or 3 colours, in chequer-work...called pladden". Later accounts say "their doublet, breeches and stockings [were made] of a stuff they called plaid". "The usual habit[clothing] of both sexes is the pladd;...women's much finer,...colours more lively,...squares much larger than the men's." And in 1703, "...the women are at great pains, first to give an exact Pattern of the Plad upon a piece of Wood, having the number of every Thred of the Stripe on it... Every Isle differs from each other in their Fancy of making Plads, as to the Stripes in Breadth and Colours."

Thus it is clear that the word plaid in olden times was used for the checkered design. Apparently in Scotland the language evolved and the word plaid took on a different meaning. In America it retained its old meaning and does to this day. It is distressing to have people from Scotland insist, with an air of superior knowledge that really masks narrow parochial ignorance, that tartan is the only proper term in this context. One is used to such an attitude from that tribe below the Tweed, but one would hope that Scots were more broadminded.

G. A LETTER IN GOV. LACHLAN MACQUARIE'S HANDWRITING. This is a transcript of a letter sent from Lachlan Macquarie, Gov. of NSW, to the Rev. John Joseph Therry, priest to the Roman Catholic people of NSW, on 29 Oct 1821. Macquarie had participated in the ceremony of laying the cornerstone of St. Mary's Chapel which was the 1st Roman Catholic church built in NSW. The original letter, which is in the governor's handwriting, is in the archives of the present St. Mary's Cathedral in Sydney, Australia. Copies were furnished by The Rev. Lex Johnson of St. Mary's during the Clan MacQuarrie Gathering in Aug 1988. If you ever get to St. Mary's, notice Gov. Macquarie in part of 1 of the stained glass windows.

Macquarie's humanitarianism led him to be concerned with the plight of the Roman Catholic populace which had been without a regular place of worship for 32 years. Since most of these were Irish who had been transported in connection with rebellions in Ireland, many free settlers and officials in London were less than sympathetic to their situation. Note, even Macquarie hopes they will remain "loyal and faithful Subjects of the Crown".

Dear Sir

*Received from your hands,
with much pleasure, in your own
name and that of your Roman
Catholic brethren of New South
Wales, the very handsome Silver
Trowel now presented wo me, and I feel myself much honored in having been thus Selected to make use of this Instrument
in laying the first stone of the first Roman Catholic Chapel
attempted to be erected in Australia.*

*The Sentiments you have addressed to me, are congenial with my own, in the beneficial result
to be derived from the erection of the proposed edifice.*

It has been a great gratification to me to witness and assist at the ceremony now performed, -and I have every hope, that the consideration of the British Government, in Supplying the Roman Catholics of this colony with established Clergymen, will be the means of strengthening and augmenting (-if that be possible-) the attachment of the Catholics of New South Wales to the British Government, and will prove an inducement to them to continue as I have ever found them to be, loyal and faithful Subjects to the Crown.-

I beg you will accept of my best acknowledgements for the sentiments of friendly regard and kind good wishes, you have pleased to express for myself and my family.-

Sydney

29 Octr. 1821

L. Macquarie

Gov. in Chief of N.S. Wales

To. The Revd. John Joseph Therry

It appears a line of the original may be cut off this photocopy.

Dear Sir,

Receive from your hands
with much pleasure, in your own
name and that of your Roman
Catholic Brethren of New South
Wales, the very handsome Silver
Towel now presented to me, and I feel myself much honored in having been thus selected to
make use of this Instrument
in laying the first stone of the
first Roman Catholic Chapel
attempted to be erected in Australia.
The sentiments you have addressed to me, are congenial with
my own, in the beneficial result
to be derived from the erection of the proposed Edifice. — It

It has been a great gratification to me to witness and assist at the Ceremony now performed; - and I have every hope that the consideration of the British Government, in supplying the Roman Catholics of this Colony with established Clergy, will be the means of strengthening and augmenting
 (if that be possible) the attachment of the Catholics of New South Wales to the British Government, and will be an inducement to them to continue as I have ever found them to be, loyal and faithful Subjects to the Crown. - May you will accept of my best acknowledgements for the sentiments of friendly regard and kind good wishes you have been pleased to express for myself and my family. -

Dorsey
 29. Oct. 1821

L. M. G. M. W. D.
 Gov. in Chief of N. S. Wales.

To The Rev. Mr. Eschle Thero.

Part 4-- THE DIASPORA

A. The Crary Connection. In 1651 Clan chief Allan MacQuarrie and many of his Clan were killed at the Battle of Inverkeithing while supporting King Charles II's cause against Oliver Cromwell and his forces. One tradition has only 7 male MacQuarries leaving the battlefield alive. Until recently it was thought the MacQuarries had supported only the anti-Cromwellian side. Research carried out in the past few years indicates this is not so.

A certain Peter MacQuarrie was supposedly born in 1645. His descendants claim he was a supporter of Cromwell, although it is more likely, given his age, that he was part of a family that supported the Parliamentarian. Anyway, after Cromwell was overthrown he was persecuted by the English and, unable to return to MacQuarrie homelands, he changed his name to Crary and went to the American colonies. By April 1663, he was recorded as being in New London, Connecticut and later settled in Groton, Conn.

Peter apparently retained his rebellious nature as church records in Connecticut in 1701 show that he was "suspended [from the sacraments]...for offending [Pastor] Saltonstall.

Information about his descendants can be had from:

CRARY COUSINS

5330 Arbor Vitae #107

Los Angeles, California ZIP

B. Argyle, New York. In 1739 4 couples came from Ulva, Scotland to New York: John McQuary & wife Anna Quarry, Duncan McQuarrie & wife Effie McNeil, Patric McEachern & wife Mary McQuarry, Donald Lindsay & wife Mary McQuarrie. Hoping for land in the Argyle Patent in Washington County, they 1st settled, with their children, along the Hudson River, near Kingston or across the river in Columbia or Dutchess Counties. When the Patent was finally granted, John & Anna lived on lot 42(400 acres), Duncan & Effie on lot 81(500 acres).

In 1790, Donald & wife Elizabeth came from Isle of Mull and settled in Argyle. Descendants of the above lived in Argyle until the early 1900s, but no MacQuarries live there now. [The editor once met a couple John & Rosabelle McQuarrie from Minnesota who said ancestor came from Argyle, but I have lost touch with them. I have numerous records from Argyle, which has a very good historical society. I even have a copy of a 6 page contract between a Daniel McQuarrie and the town of Argyle for Daniel to build a stone bridge in the town in 1870. I saw the bridge and think it is still standing.]

For more information contact: Office of the Town Historian
Town of Argyle

or the editor.

Argyle, New York 12809

C. After Culloden. John MacQuarrie(1710-1790)fought for Bonnie Prince Charlie at the Battle of Culloden and after the defeat, escaped to his home on Eigg. There he was captured by the British forces and listed as prisoner #2402. He was convicted of rebellion and sentenced to 7 years transportation.

He was sent to Lynchburg, Virginia in 1748 on the ship Pennela. There he was indentured to the family of William Stout for 7 years at the price of 7 pounds. After 3 years he was released from his indentureship. A year later(1753) he married William Stout's daughter Miranda. They had 4 children; John, Jr. (Nov 1754), Mary(Dec 1760), Annie(Jan 1762) & William(Feb 1765).

John, Jr., and maybe William, fought in the American Revolution on the colonial side. Each of John and William had numerous descendants who moved to Kentucky(Pulaski County), Missouri, Texas, and are now widespread throughout central USA.

For information about the descendants of John, Jr. contact

Jim McQuary
P.O.Box 367
Xenia, Ohio 45385

For those of William, get in touch with

Greg McQueary
7490 Ryebrook Lane
Rockport, Ill 61111

D. TEXAS MCQUEERYS. About 1786 George and William McQueery sailed from Scotland to America. They landed in Massachusetts and later settled in South Carolina. George married in 1800 and moved to Garrard County, Kentucky. [Garrard County is only about 25 miles from the Pulaski County in B above. We don't know if there was any connection between these two families.]

In 1853 a son Charles moved to Shreveport, La. and thence to Collin County, Texas. The family and its descendants lived in several counties(Jack, Navarro, Tarrant, Palo Pinto, Brown) near Dallas-Fort Worth and many still live in the area.

For information contact

Lowell Harris
2517 Belmont Blvd.
Bossier City, La. 71111

or Burney & Jerlene McQueery
5617 Mahaney Place
Ft. Worth, Texas 76119

E. Nova Scotia. There is a reference to an Alan MacQuarrie in Margaree Harbour in 1710; little is known of him. In 1791, Lauchlan MacQuarrie "well advanced in years" left the Isle of Rum, and Scotland and landed in Pictou, with his 5 adult children Angus, Allan, Neil, Marion & Flora. They left numerous descendants thru-out Nova Scotia, Canada & the US. An extensive genealogy appears in Vol.4 No.1 issue of Mac-Talla, April 1984, the newsletter of Clan MacQuarrie of Atlantic Canada. In 1814 John Lauchlan(little Lauchie) MacQuarrie, his wife Mary Campbell and their children Annabel, John, Donald, Annie(Nancy), Flora, Allan & Mary came from Rum to Pictou. Genealogy is in Vol.2 No.1 June 1962 issue of Clan MacQuarrie Newsletter(before it was named Mac-Talla). The editor has a copy or more information may be had from:

Marcie Macquarrie
P.O.Box 8805 Station A
Halifax, Nova Scotia
Canada B3K 5M4

F. Ontario. In 1818 (the year of the last chiefs death) 2 MacQuarrie brothers, Hector & Lachlan, and 4 sisters, Anne, Katie, Sally & Mary Ann left Ulva for New York City and settled in Masonville, Delaware County, New York state. There is some question whether they were really all brothers and sisters, but they were likely related. With them was their old father whose name by various accounts was Hugh, Donald or Job.

At various times they moved to Canada and by 1825 were all in Maple, Ontario. Hector's descendants moved north to Gore Bay, Manitoulin Island, Ontario and some are still there. Lachlan's and the 4 sisters' offspring stayed in Maple for some generations and many are still there. These MacQuarries were likely related to another group that settled near Caledonia, Ontario about the same time, but the connection hasn't been established.

Later groups came in 1834 (from Iona) and 1848 and were likely kin of the above. They settled respectively in near Argyle and Shelborne, Ontario.

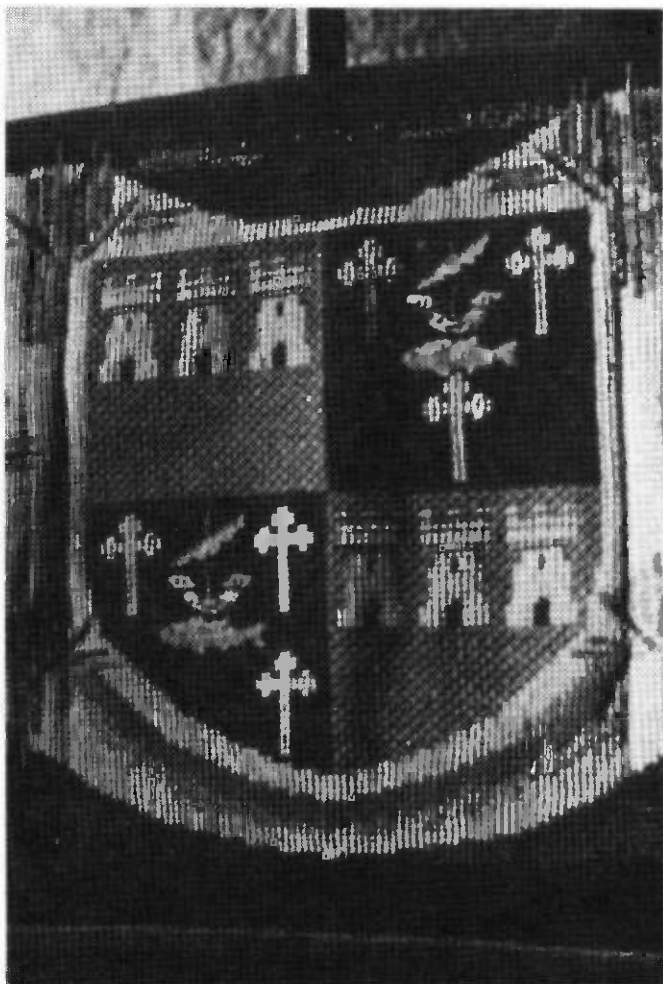

More information from the editor (address in front of book).

G. New Zealand. Early in the 1860s John McQuarrie left Scotland and settled in Dunedin; his wife joined him in 1868 with several children and they moved to Invercargill. At least one of the children went to Australia.

About the same time Hector McQuarrie came to New Zealand and built ships. Later Robert Frank McQuarrie and wife Janet McKewan came from Glasgow in North Island. Other MacQuarries are listed as passengers on the immigration ships, but we have no further records of descendants.

1 branch of MacQuarries intermarried with the Maori natives of New Zealand. At the Clan Gathering on Mull (1985) there was a very beautiful McQuarrie who obviously had southseas blood in her. For further information contact:

Bob McQuarrie
Upper Weenik Rd.
Greymouth, South Island
New Zealand

MacQuarrie Coat of Arms
on a choir cushion in Abbey at Iona.

A tombstone traditionally thought to be of a MacQuarrie Chief.
In Abbey Museum on Iona.

Part 5

A MacQUARRIE TOUR of MULL, ULVA, IONA and STAFFA

There are many things for tourists to see and visit on these islands. This account is meant to point out places that have special meaning to MacQuarries. I would suggest you buy a regular Island Guide in one of the shops for the other things to see.

A. Getting to Mull. There are 2 ferries between the Scotch mainland & Mull; both take cars. The main one from Oban runs every day including Sunday, is a large ship and books reservations. Oban is 1 of the largest cities in the Highlands, has many tourist accommodations, is on a rail line from Glasgow and fairly easy to get to by car. The other ferry from Lochaline, has no Sunday service, is much smaller & can't be booked. Lochaline, an isolated village has 1 gas station, 1 shop and a few Bed & Breakfasts. The Lochaline ferry costs about 1/2 to 1/3 as much as the Oban one.

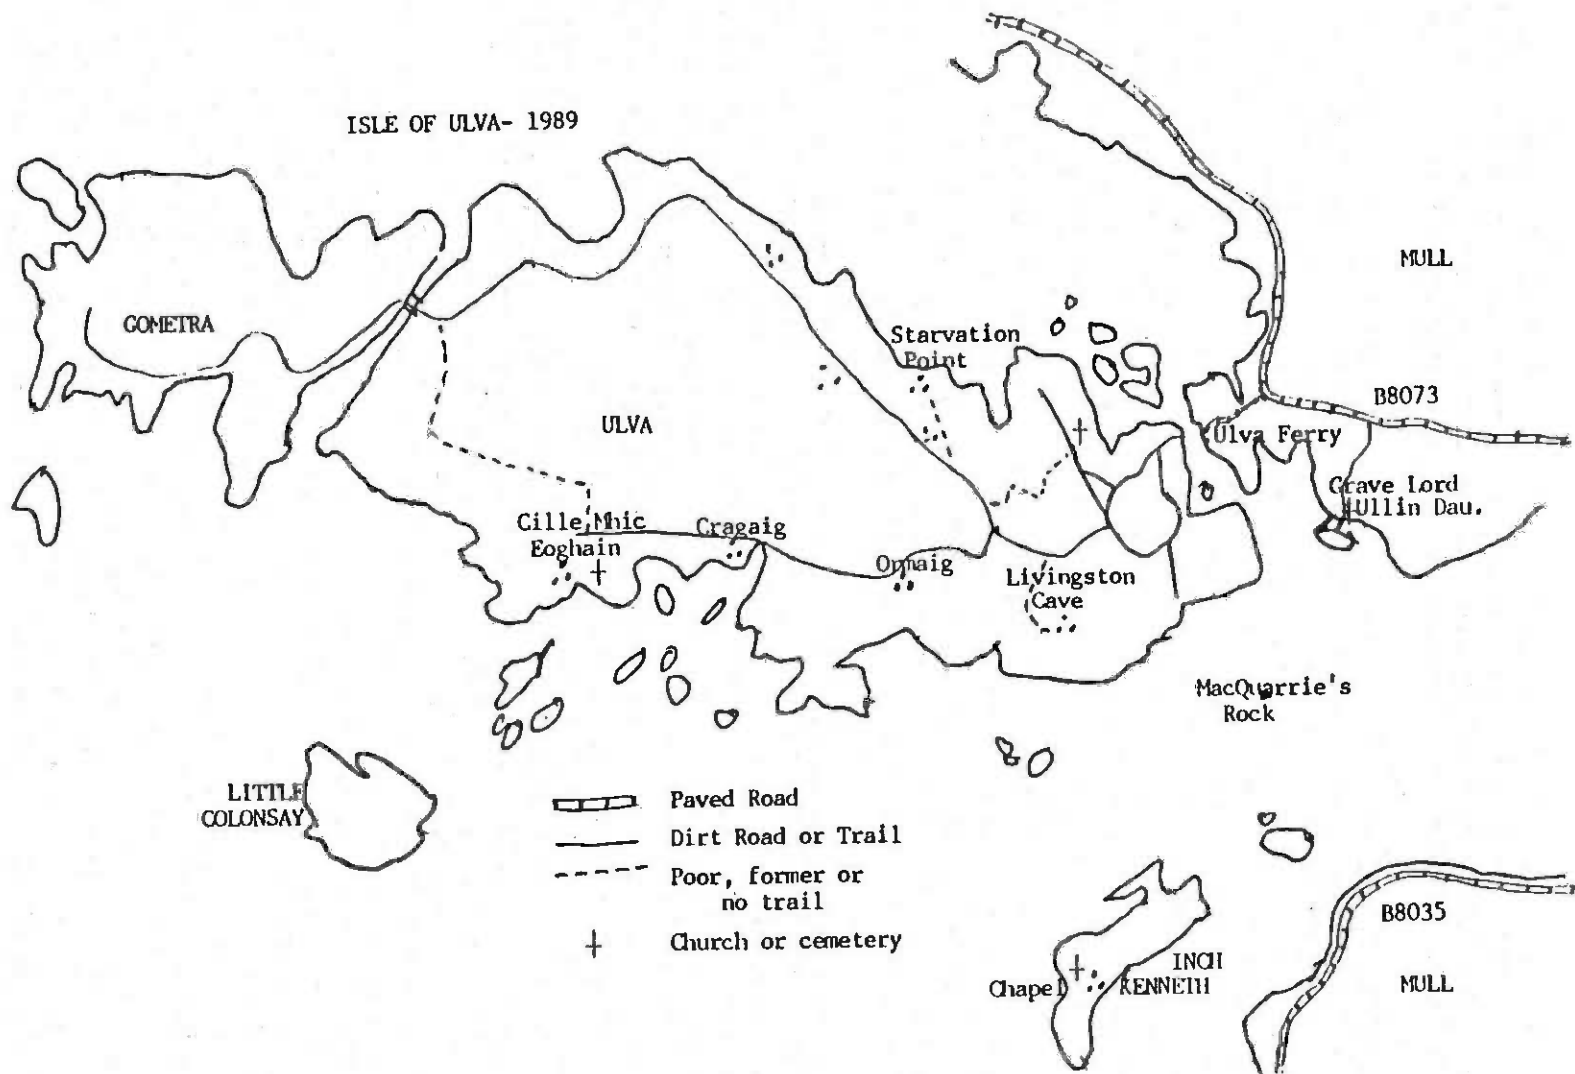

The Oban boat lands at the village of Craignure(public toilets) that from Lochaline at Fishnish, just a pier. Since Craignure is only a few miles from Fishnish, we assume this tour starts at Craignure and that we have a car. Cars can be rented at BAYVIEW Garage(1/2 mile on left as you leave the Craignure pier) if you write way ahead of time. Bus tours of Mull can be booked in Oban and there is a public bus from Craignure thru Salen to Tobermory.

B. Before going to Ulva. turn left and head east on A849. After a mile road will become single lane(for both directions; go slow and be prepared to pull over to let cars you meet pass, most Mull roads are like this). After 2 miles turn left on road that leads to Duart Castle, ancient seat of the Macleans. MacQuarries were long time allies of the Macleans and our chiefs would likely have visited this castle. The 12-13th century castle has been restored and is usually open, admission 1-2 pounds.

Return to the A849 road, turn right back toward Craignure and go thru it toward Salen. About 9 miles from Craignure you come to Pennygown. In this village the last MacQuarrie chief spent his final days(Chap VII). There is an ancient chapel without a roof here that may be 700 years old. Looking left you will see Glen Forsa which was Macquarie land at one time. Continue 2 more miles to Salen(public toilets), founded by Gov. Lachlan Macquarie. There is a gas station(1 of 7 on Mull), 3-4 shops, 1 restaurant, 1 hotel & Post Office. If you take A849 you come to Tobermory the only town on Mull(bank here, 2 gas stations, many shops, etc.) You should visit Tobermory some time, but MacQuarries will likely want to turn left at Salen and go south on B8035 toward Ulva.

3 miles along B8073 goes to right, but continue on B8035 for 100 yds & turn left on dirt road to Gov. Macquarie's Mausoleum. Nearby is Gruline Farm where Mr./Mrs. Thomson rent holiday houses (headquarters for 1985 MacQuarrie Gathering). Return to B8035, turn right, go to B8073 and turn left. Ulva Ferry is 8 miles.

B8073 gradually rises and on left see the isles of Eorsa and Inchkenneth(burial place of last 2 chiefs). When the road drops you can see Ulva, also to the left. About a mile before Ulva Ferry dirt road to the left(small sign) leads to Lord Ullin's daughter' grave and memorial down on the shore.(best to walk down). A little further on the right is a white farmhouse, Oskamull, where Gov. Macquarie lived. On the rise behind are ruins of old(MacQuarrie?) village. 100 yards beyond Oskamull is a paved road on the left near a school house. Take the left road for 1/2 mile to the ferry for Ulva or Staffa. See below for guides to these isles.

C. On to Tobermory on B8073. Next farmhouse on the right is Ulva Ferry Post Office(in the kitchen). They are very good about using the Ulva Ferry post mark on letters if you wish. A mile along this road you will cross a stone bridge near a triple waterfall(1 on right, 2 on left of road) worth stopping and seeing. A hard climb into the hills on the right will bring you to Glen MacQuarrie, but access is easier from the Salen to Dervaig road. Several miles further a paved road goes to the right to the village of Dervaig. This intersection is Torloisk where a Maclean family lived at one time(Chap VII). The right road over the hills has little on it except a wonderful view of Dervaig before you begin a very steep descent.(about 4-5 miles to Dervaig).

Stay on B8073 about a mile and on right is Church of Kilninian; present building dates from the 1700s although a church was on the spot long before that. Until 1828, when church was built on Ulva (still standing), this was the parish church for Clan MacQuarrie. Continue for 5 or so miles and you come to Calgary(public toilet) with its beautiful beach and bay; Canadians may be especially interested since their city was named after this peaceful village.

3-4 more miles brings you to a paved road on the left to Croig. About 100 yds beyond the end of the paving is a table of rock called Dun(Fort) MacQuarrie. No remains of a fort and rock formation is fairly small. Back to B8073, turn left. About 100yds on the left is the home of Ian Morrison who runs a boat to Staffa from Ulva Ferry. I have found him very reliable and recommend his services. He once took me to Cairn na Burgh More in the Treshnish Isles. 2-3 miles further brings you to the village of Dervaig (public toilets, shop, hotel). Right turn here will put you on back to Salen. Dervaig is home to smallest theater in the world (Guinness Book of Records), 42 seats. 6-7 miles on B8073 to Tobermory(public toilets, bank, shops, hotels). Mull Museum has some things about MacQuarries. Some MacQuarries in the cemetery here.

D. Tobermory to Iona. Pick up the A848 and you will return to Salen 9 miles away. 2 miles before Salen a road on the left goes to ruins of Aros Castle(100 yds). MacQuarries are associated with this castle. Turn right onto the B8035 again and go past Macquarie Mausoleum to Knock Farm. This is the traditional home of the "real" Lord Ullin's daughter. A public trail to the left leads to beautiful Loch Ba which is overlooked by Gov. Macquarie's home. Continue on B8035; this would likely be the way Lord Ullin's daughter fled with her MacQuarrie lover. About 4-5 miles from Knock, the Isle of Eorsa will be on your right. On the left is a trail(not well marked) up Ben More with its lovely view of Ulva. The climb is fairly gradual and easy, but it is 3,000 ft. Several miles along, the cliffs crowd the shore and you will see Ulva on your right. If you are very lucky you might see MacQuarrie's Rock which shows only a few times a year at very low tide(it's about 2/3 of the way toward Ulva). Further on is Gribun where the last MacQuarrie chief spent some of his later years.

Livingston House, near the cave. Ulva

Ruins of the Old Smiddy, Ulva. Near the ferry.

Looking out to sea you will note Inch Kenneth, the isle where the last 2 chiefs are buried. It would be near here that the ferry to Ulva(that Lord Ullin's daughter took) used to run. At Gribun the road turns inland and rises up a glen. Everyone, except the driver look back, and see a beautiful view of Ulva, Staffa and Little Colonsay(where the last chief also lived).

Continue on B8035 until it meets A849(about 7 miles). Turn right toward Iona and after 2 miles at Pennyghael there is a gas station. 10 miles further is the village of Bunessan, 2 shops, gas station, post office. A little before Bunessan on the left is a monument to Mary MacDonald. While not connected with MacQuarries, it is interesting. Mary composed a Gaelic hymn, "Babe in the Cradle", with a beautiful melody. Years later other people formalized the melody(taking credit for doing so) and put new words to it. It became popular as: "Morning has broken,

Like the first morning.

Blackbird has spoken,...".

Mary gets no credit for this, but the melody is called Bunessan after the village where she lived.

On 6 miles to Fionphort(shop and gas station) where the ferry for Iona leaves about hourly. Take the ferry(no cars). The village of Iona on the isle has several shops and eating places. Proceed to the Abbey which has been restored. On the seats in the choir stalls are cushions with Clan emblems on them; 2 cushions have the MacQuarrie shield on them as shown on p 87. In the Abbey Museum is a tombstone that has been traditionally considered of a MacQuarrie chief[p 87], although recent research questions this. In any case it has been documented that some MacQuarrie chiefs have been buried at the Abbey.

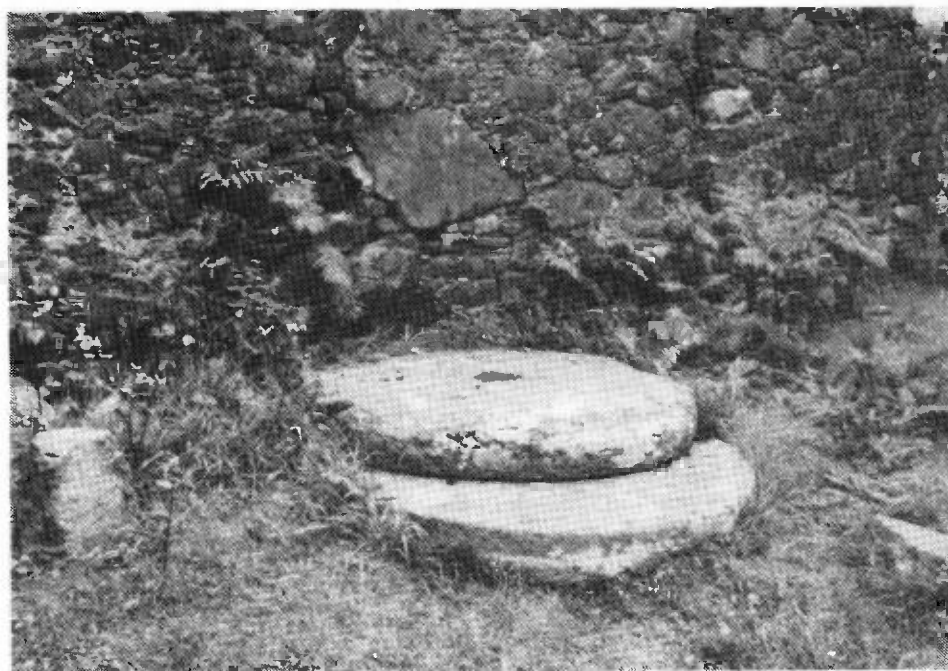

E. Returning to Craignure along A849, about 10 miles past where B8035 meets it, you will come to an unnumbered paved road on the right at Strathcoil. This road leads to the ruins of Moy Castle, the headquarters of the MacLaines of Lochbuie, who were so closely related to Clan MacQuarrie. Shirley MacLaine the movie star is supposedly a descendant so many MacQuarries may be related to her. It's a long way there(8 miles) and back and is not a lot to see. Continuing along A849 you will come to Craignure or Fishnish and your ferry off Mull.

F. Trip to Staffa. Staffa was owned by Clan MacQuarrie, but it is worth seeing in its own right. The rock formations are very unusual and Fingal's cave on it was the inspiration for Mendelssohn to write the Hebridean Overture to his Scotch Symphony.

Most boats leave for Staffa from Ulva Ferry(pier at end of road at school house near Oskamull), although some do go from Bunessan or Fionphort. I think it is important that you get a trip that will let you land on Staffa if at all possible. Over the years, I found Mr. Ian Morrison to be very reliable. It takes about 1/2 day and some days trips leave twice daily. It is possible to walk into Fingal's Cave and hear the pounding surf as Mendelssohn did. Other caves are inaccessible.

The Old Mill, Cragaig, Ulva.

Millstones in the Cragaig mill.

G. Tour of Ulva. Ulva is open for visitors Mon - Fri from 9am to about 4-5pm. Go to the pier at end of road from school house near Oskamull; signal the ferryman to come and get you. Charge is 1.5 pounds. By the autumn of 1989 a museum should be ready at the pier on the Ulva side. Brochures telling about trails on the isle are available there. We'll describe 3 walks here(1 short, 2 long) referring to the page 89 map. All 3 start by going to the right of the ferryhouse and following the road to Gometra:

Walk A(short): Follow road to 2nd right; this leads to the 1828 church after another right. On leaving the church retrace steps for a while, but go straight and don't take the 1st left. Continue past some farm buildings(not a right up the hill to Gometra). You will pass some dwellings and more farm buildings. I think one these is the Old Chief's house(where he entertained Boswell & Johnson), but I haven't found out which one. From here you can go right and follow several paths down to the sea. If you continue on you will return to a point about 100 yds behind the ferry house.

Walk B(up to 7 miles & back): Take road to Gometra. At farm buildings turn right; go up hill past the water reservoir. At top you will be on a sort of rolling plateau. If you want to hike cross country, you can go off to the left and look for cave that David Livingston's(famous African explorer) ancestors lived in. Archeological diggings going on; do not disturb them. Also in this area, near the sea, are columnar rock formations like those on Staffa. There is no trail though.

Staying on the road to Gometra about 1/2 mile, you will come to poorer road to the left. This road takes you on walk B, see below.

Continue on the road to Gometra for 1/2 mile until you see a stone sheep coral on the left. To the right down by the shore is Starvation Point with ruins of 10 or so stone huts. When the MacQuarries were driven off Ulva, they were forced to live here until a ship came to take them away. There is no trail, but on the right side of the road a fence line runs down a ravine toward the shore. Follow the fence to near the shore and you will see the ruins.

It is about 4 miles more along the road to the causeway to Gometra; nice views of Mull with numerous ruins of villages. In the old days a trail continued on around the island and meet with the end of Walk C, but I've never found it. I once walked around the southwest end of Ulva along the rocky shore, but it was very hard going. It is best to return by the same road you came on.

Walk C(up to 6 miles and back): Go on Walk B until the poorer road goes off to the left. This road will take you over the hill to the south side of the island. About 1 mile along is village of Ormaig, ruins of about 8-10 houses. From Ormaig you have a beautiful view of islands south of Ulva; Little Colonsay, Staffa, etc. Less than a mile on is village of Cragaig with its abandoned mill. Soon after this road becomes a footpath, but continue on for another mile to the old MacQuarrie graveyard at Cille Mbic Eogbainn; various ruins on the way. Return the way you came.

PART 6 THINGS FOR FURTHER STUDY and RESEARCH

A. Feriniquarrie. In the western part of the Isle of Skye is a village by the name of Feriniquarrie which means in Gaelic "land of the MacQuarries". Historically, there seems to be little or no connection of our Clan with Skye. In the late 1970s, I visited the oldest resident in the village and asked him the origin of the name. He confirmed its meaning, but had no idea why it was so. It would be nice to find out how the village got its name.

B. Eigg, Rum, Muck and Cana. About 20 miles north of Mull is a group of islands called the small isles. Although it seems clear that all MacQuarries came originally from Ulva, large numbers of MacQuarries trace their ancestry to these islands, particularly Eigg and Rum (sometimes spelled Rhum). Apparently there was a definite move by many MacQuarries from Ulva to these island, but when or why doesn't seem to be known.

There is some indication that religion may have been a factor; many of the Clan from Rum and Eigg were Roman Catholic while the MacQuarries who stayed on Ulva tended to be Church of Scotland Presbyterians, although there were exceptions.

There is a story about The Church of the Yellow Stick that may have some bearing. I have heard the tale associated with Ulva and Mull, but other MacQuarries insist it happened on Eigg:

At times, Clan MacQuarrie was overshadowed by the Macleans (there were several strong families of them on Mull). One of the Macleans, maybe Maclean of Coll, converted to Protestantism early during the reformation and felt that his tenants, many of whom were MacQuarries, should also. So every Sunday Maclean, who walked with a yellow cane, stood at a fork in the road where one branch went to the Catholic Church and the other to the Church of Scotland. He would wave his cane at people and threaten them with eviction and other dire consequences if they went to the wrong church, i.e. Roman Catholic. After a while it was enough for Maclean to push his yellow stick into the ground at the fork to convey the message. Thus the Protestant church came to be called 'the Church of the Yellow Stick'.

Perhaps someday we can learn the facts of the MacQuarrie migration to Eigg and Rum.

C. Campbell Records at Inverary Castle. Inverary Castle in the village of Inverary on Loch Fyne is the seat of Clan Campbell and I understand there are extensive records there that date back 100s of years. Some research for MacQuarrie references there has been carried out, but more information may await a careful search. Despite bitter feelings from early times, I'm told that Campbells and MacQuarries even talk civilly to each other these days.

D. Ruins on Ulva, etc. It would be nice to have someone catalog all the ruins on Ulva, Gometra, and some of the Treshnish Isles. Munro has identified nearly all of the old villages on Ulva, but it would be nice to know how many ruined buildings (and their possible use) there are in each village. MacQuarries manned forts on Cairn na Burgh Mor (big) and Cairn na Burgh Beg (little) in the Treshnish Isles; descriptions of the forts might be interesting.

Mrs. Ingram of Kilbrennan(Mull) told me an unusual tale about Cairn na Burgh More. Americans talk about being as "busy as a bee", but Mull people speak of being as "busy as the guard on Cairn na Burgh More". This island has high sheer cliffs on all sides with entrance to the fort up a narrow ravine that slopes gradually. This was blocked with a strong wooden gate that was easily defended. On another side of the island was a very, very steep cleft down which the defenders could slide and slip away if necessary. Unfortunately, an attacker might, with difficulty, climb this cleft at night and get inside the fort, so a guard was put at the top. If there was a full-moon there was no problem, but if the night was dark, the guard couldn't see down the cleft. So every few minutes he rolled a fair sized boulder down the cleft to dislodge anyone who might be climbing up. When daylight came, since there were a limited number of boulders at the top, he had to go down and carry stones back up for next nights guard duty. This Sisyphean task led to the phrase, "as busy as the guard on Cairn na Burgh More".

E. Graveyard at Cille Mbic . On the south side of Ulva, about 6 miles from the ferry to Mull, is the ancient graveyard of the MacQuarries. There may even be the ruins of a church nearby. The site, in very poor condition, has been designated as a Scottish national monument. Except for the winter and early spring, 6 foot tall bracken(a kind of fern) makes the spot difficult to find, much less inspect. Perhaps someday a group of MacQuarries will sponsor a project to clear and restore the site. This would 1st require spraying poison on the bracken. If done at the proper season, the treatment lasts many years. Lord Ullin's daughters gravesite was treated in 1984 and is still fairly open.

F. Index for this book. I apologize for not making an index for this book, so if someone would like to, it would make a very nice addition to it.

--

I am sure there are errors and mistakes in this book and I take full responsibility for them. When you find them, please let me know.

The Editor

--